HEROES, AND BANDITS

Various types of governments have caused powerful men to organize and constitute various types of governments. During the twentieth century there has existed an ongoing struggle for power between two distinctly different dominant forms of government, Communism, embracing Totalitarianism, and Representative Constitutional Republics, embracing human rights.

People may be classified as naturally carnivorous or herbivorous. People who prey upon other people constitute the former class and people who do not constitute the latter class. A third class of people constituted from the two basic classes is military. These three classes may be termed workers, heroes, and bandits and represent the total population of people in any society. Their actions, successes, and failures determine the political, social, and economic conditions of that society and it's people who are living within that society and subject to it's conditions.

The Communist alleges the business owner is evil depriving the worker of an adequate existence, thereby justifying Communists behaving as bandits who steal all the owners private property making it state owned and controlled. Communists also steal the worker, pretending they will provide him with a more adequate existence, making him a slave working for the state. The Communist steals all private property making it state owned. The actual reasons for Communism has nothing to do with creating a better existence for other people. Communism is used by bandits to disguise themselves as saviors of the poor so they can gain control of government, workers, property, and power. Communist ideology empowers state bandits justifying they're crimes. The tyrant was being thrown out of power and government by violent revolutions establishing the rights of man. The tyrant needed a way to dethrone the victorious worker, who controlled state power through representative constitutional government. The tyrant invented Communism as a counter revolutionary movement to defeat other governments and reestablish totalitarianism re-empowering the tyrant. This is why Communism advocates world wide violent revolution. It pretends to empower the worker but does not. It's phony, a trick. It enslaves the worker to the bandit and deprives him of life, liberty, power, and property.

In Communism the theorists allege two classes of citizens perpetually opposing each other, the owners of the means of production, the business owner, and their workers. Communism uses government as a way to prevent the alleged exploitation of the workers, the proletariat, by the business owners, the bourgeois. Communists confiscate all private property making it state owned and controlled. The Communist alleges the business owner is the enemy (a bandit) and ruins him by confiscating his property, eliminating private ownership of property, forcing people to work for the government. The government functions as a bandit, eliminating business owners. Communism places the worker in a position of complete servitude to the state reducing him to a slave.

Communism places the working man in a worse position than he previously had because private ownership of property has been eliminated. If a man cannot own anything he cannot be poorer. Ownership of private property is essential because people must eat, consumed food is permanently owned; it becomes a part of the person who consumed it and cannot be taken back. If a man cannot own anything his life is in danger. This is, ultimately, a far worse condition for the worker, the business owner, and the government because it results in a retarded economy, lower NNP, lower per capita income, fewer tax revenues, and less personal freedom, fewer personal rights, and undoubtedly less individual happiness for most people. Not only do the business owners lose their rights, so do the workers. It is the state of the tyrant, a criminal, a bandit.

However, the personal power of some people, people in the Communist Party - the government, is intentionally increased because Communism allows these people to indulge themselves in the criminal behavior of the bandit. Communism empowers the bandit in this way because it creates bandits to fight, ruin, rob, and kill imaginary bandits, the Bourgeois. In this way it creates and classifies people into real and imaginary bandits and pits real bandits against imaginary bandits, virtually vilifying, and intrinsically making evil, real or imagined, these people within it's system.

Communism uses the workers efforts to increase the military might of the state. Instead of directing industry to produce consumer goods and services for public consumption Communists direct industry to produce military equipment. This is because Communists are tyrants; they do not care about the prosperity and well being of other people; their interest is in dominating and using others. In a Communist state tyranny reigns supreme, never letting go of the reins of power, completely dominating and subjugating the population. The mind and ideals of the tyrant are embodied in state policy, state action, state military might. The individual person is of no consequence and only exists to serve the state. He is an expendable, perishable, commodity which the state uses to benefit itself, its goals and objectives. In Communism the person is reduced to the condition of an object, a thing, completely controlled by the state and required to act as one. No deviation from rules is permitted, people have no freedom of personal choice, as though they have no feelings or emotions, no mind or intelligence to direct their behavior outside of state mandated activity. Reducing people to the status of a machine raises the state to the status of an immoral God. The state becomes the tyrant completely controlling resources to empower itself.

This teaches hatred causing Communists to respond criminally against owners they are taught are detrimental to the welfare of the state and the working class and must be ruined and destroyed with crime under the guise that this leads to the liberation of the Proletariat. This policy produces a group of bandits and misguided revolutionaries who spread evil instead of good. That slaughter, unfortunately, includes the lives of workers also, because as Bandits, Communists are inherently lawless and immoral, and as humans, guilty of the same weaknesses and foibles as all human beings. From Communism a class of bullies arises. These people have virtually no inherent respect for other people simply because they are people. Empathy with the feelings of others and altruism in their actions is replaced by a love of victimization, cruelty, and malice. These people make marks out of other people and terrorize them because they enjoy it and profit by it. By this behavior they entertain themselves and enrich themselves. It is interesting to note that Communists adopted Marx and Marxism as their fundamental socioeconomic system. This is because Marxism gives Communists a policy mandating them to victimize others allowing the bandit to actualize his most basic instincts that motivate him to rob, terrorize and kill others.

When crime is used to achieve political, social, and economic goals, this policy results in the end justifying the means and anyone in the way is victimized. Undoubtedly, such pervasive victimization of other people becomes a way of life for such Communists and becomes a end unto itself, a sport, a form of play. Then almost any non Communist who engages these Communists is victimized by them because victimizing others causes this type of Communist to experience a form of pleasure known as sadism. Sadistic tendencies cause Communists to poison other people's reproductive systems, producing impotence, and castration. Through crime Communist leaders and their accomplices, who share in the spoils of this social war, increase their personal power and wealth. Communism effectively ruins the two legitimate real roles people assume within any society, public and private, and empowers the one illegal one, the role of the criminal. Communism does not defend and protect people's rights. It constantly violates the rights of others as a matter of policy thereby promoting evil.

65. A two cycle internal combustion engine having a housing means to provide the necessary spaces in the engine, a reciprocating means to output engine power and force combustion products out of the engine, a compressor means to force combustible material into said housing means and compress it there, a valve means to control fluids passing to said reciprocating means, wherein the improvement comprises a fuel supply means to supply fuel into said housing means upstream of said valve means to cause combustion to commence upstream of said valve means.

CHAPTER ONE HEROES, AND BANDITS

these three groups behavior's all other groups are defined in sub categories. The basic problem of human existence is the need to provide oneself with the necessities of life. In doing this people come into conflict. Different forms of government have always existed in societies, and as the human race continued to progress, and develop new capabilities, their forms changed. About the same time in European history two new and very different political groups appeared. One was the Constitutional form of representative government as embodied in the Constitutions of France, the United States of America, and Poland. Constitutional representative government was devised and created to suppress military dominance of the population and accelerate peaceful human accomplishment. About the same time a long lasting revolutionary political faction in France, the Jacobins, that advocated the violent overthrow of the existing political order appeared and is the earliest form of Communism.

Karl Marx later appeared and developed a social theory, Marxism, in which he proposed that people are divided into classes, the owners, and the workers. He claimed the owners are the exploiters of the workers; that these two classes are always struggling with each other and this problem can only be solved by revolutionizing the government and putting the means of production under state control and the state employing the workers. By comparison the constitutional representative government of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Hamilton, et al put the means of Government into the hands of the people by having them elect themselves to government positions, through regular popular majority votes. The elected representatives write and pass the laws under which the people live. In this system, the military, under civilian authority, enforces the laws, so the citizens of the country can work and live in safety and liberty, and achieve prosperity, happiness, and justice. This system works so long as the military, the Heroes, properly performs the job assigned to them according to the laws written by the people. Effective civilian control of the military is an absolute necessity, especially at the local level.

Communism adopted Marxism as a political theory because it gives tyrants an excuse to steal from the rich business owners, and the people, and enlists the worker as a military man to overthrow business owners and legitimate government. Then bandits, disguised as government, can steal from the most productive people, the rich business owners, enslave the poor and gain military might. They were later to cause the Bolshevik revolution in Russia, the conversion of China to Communism under Mao Tse Tung, and the overthrow of governments of some lesser countries. They have always advocated world wide revolution and violence as a means to empower the working man so he can break the alleged bonds of enslavement forced upon him by the wealthy owners and overthrow legitimate government. It is a ruse to enslave people and empower bandits. Hatred of the wealthy underlies Communist ideology attracting the poor, but when you compare the luxuries of the poor in developed countries this Communist hatred of the wealthy can only be rationally understood as a form of insanity because it is folly. The hatred, atheism, and lawlessness of Communists combines to make them murderers of their opponents, talented people who can think, have a conscience, know right from wrong, are the supporters of a representative constitutional form of government, prosper under that kind of system, and oppose tyrants, bandits, and fools who love and use evil.

On his death bed Karl Marx is reported to have said, "I am not a Communist." Most likely this is because Communists are bandits and fools. Communist countries have a per capita income of about $300.00 a year which is virtually nothing compared to industrialized societies in the west. Western industrialized countries have governments that are organized to operate in very much the same way as the government of the United States is organized to operate. They empower all the
